JOB MARKET PAPER

Narratives of Blame

Narratives of blame explain the disappointments of some people through the undeserved advantages of others. I develop a model in which a left and a right party use such narratives to mobilize their supporters by suggesting that they deserve better. I distinguish conditions favoring the right in mobilizing with blame from those favoring the left, and show how incentives to do so distort policy choices. To measure narratives of blame, I develop two AI-based methods and apply them to 1.4 million US congressional speeches from 1945 to 2026. I show that Republicans and Democrats began shifting toward non-economic blame as early as the 1980s, increasingly emphasizing crime and health. This shift coincides with declining salience of economic issues and growing Republican support among culturally aggrieved and less educated voters. Viewed through the model, these developments suggest that Republicans have become increasingly effective at mobilizing with blame relative to Democrats over several decades.
